QUESTION ONE

Study the case and answer the questions that follow:

Barasa, a Human Resource Manager for an insurance company, was beginning to wonder about the quality of the personnel that the firm's supervisors were recruiting. Typically the divisional and departmental supervisors were responsible for hiring insurance sales agents and computer programmers with little guidance from the home office. Barasa's primary recruitment responsibility was to ensure that there was no discrimination and offer whatever assistance in the recruitment process that other managers might request. Barasa's concern was about the recruitment process centered on the firm's inability to attract high caliber personnel. This was especially evident with sales agents who were routinely terminated by the company for ineffectiveness. Sales agent's applicants normally applied without prior solicitation by the company. An examination of the employment history of many sales agents revealed a work history marked by numerous job changes and career shifts. In spite of his suggestions to the contrary, the major Foundation Of Innovations requirement currently used by supervisors for sales agents was that they possess a state license to sell life insurance. Unfortunately the requirements for such a license are not very exact. Once hired, agents entered a life and health insurance training programme, many candidates were unable to successfully complete the programme because they could not pass the written examinations. Those who did finish the programme were often found to lack the aggressiveness that is necessary to perform well in a highly competitive life and health insurance industry. Barasa had checked the training and the compensation programmes to determine if they were contributing to the problem and could discover no apparent weakness in these areas. He then talked to his supervisors to determine the source of the company's job applicants. It was then that he learned that nearly all candidates were simply taken from pool of unsolicited applicants who placed their resumes on file with whoever they initially contacted at the company.

REQUIRED
